Quincy, Illinois - The Gem City

The city of Quincy stands overlooking the Mississippi River, where it swings farthest to the west. John Wood, the first settler, came to the area from New York in 1821, to investigate the claim of a friend who had been granted a land bounty in the Military Tract that was set aside by an act of Congress for soldiers from the War of 1812. More people came from the East to either settle on their land grants or to engage in trade. Due to its location, the little settlement grew and became known as Bluffs.

A new county was created here in 1825 by the Illinois Legislature and was named Adams after John Quincy Adams, the president at the time. Quincy, also named for the president, was the existing village named as the county seat by a commission. Legend has it that the public square was called "John's Square," to complete the use of the name.

Up until 1830, all the houses had been constructed of logs before the first brick house was built. Continuing to grow, Quincy was incorporated as a town in 1834. The fertile soil yielded excellent crops of grain, and flour mills flourished. Game was also abundant, along with a great quantity of oak, hickory and walnut timber that was cut down to make way for the expanding community and support the flourishing saw mills. The city trade grew and along with it came the nickname, The Gem City.

In 1840, Quincy was incorporated as a city under special charter. Coming by boats to New Orleans, large numbers of German immigrants continued their journey up the river and settled in Quincy bringing their craftsmen's skills to the town. Stoves, plows, household furniture, organs, carriages and farm wagons were among many of the things being manufactured in Quincy.

During the years of development, Quincy did not escape the question of slavery that divided this country in half. Most of the citizens of Quincy were abolitionists and strongly opposed to slave holdings. This group of people formed an abolition society and soon became an important part in assisting the slaves escape from their owners to make their way to freedom in Canada. Known as the Underground Railroad, the slaves were transported from the banks of the Missouri by boat across the river into Illinois, a free state. Homes and designated "stations" concealed the fleeing slaves until they could be sent on to the next "station" and eventually to freedom in the North. Bitter feelings between the two states began to rise, and on more than one occasion, abolitionists were captured, tried and imprisoned in Missouri for helping the slaves.

After being driven out of Missouri in the winter of 1838-1839, the suffering Mormons came to Quincy and were treated kindly and sheltered before moving on to Nauvoo, fifty miles to the north.

As a river town, business and political center, Quincy became an important stop for travelers. John Wood became the 12th Governor of Illinois in 1860, and Stephen Douglas, also from this district, was elected to the Congress and later the Senate. The famous Lincoln-Douglas debates were held on October 13, 1858, at John's Square (now known as Washington Park). The square was crowded with more than 15,000 people who wanted to hear Lincoln draw from Douglas the admission that he favored permitting the states to settle the question of slavery within their borders. This statement won election to the senate for Douglas, but two years later went far toward electing Lincoln to the presidency.

All of the staff at Kelly's welcomes you to Quincy and hopes you enjoy your stay!
